Algerian War of Independence against French Colonialism and its Reflection in Literature

Farideh Alavi 1
Associate Professor, French Language and Literature, University of Tehran, Iran

Zeinab Rezvan Talab 2
Ph.D. Comparative Literature, French Literature, University of Tehran, Iran

Received: 2 June 2013 - Accepted: 2 Oct 2013

Abstract
The Algerian War of Independence, which broke out in 1954 and lasted 8 years taking innumerable lives is widely reflected in the French and Francophone works of literature. Today, half a century after the signing of the Evian Accords, we are witnessing the emergence of new works on the war, which not only record the collective memory of the nation, but also strive to satisfy the curiosity of the younger generation. It should be noted that each author, even if he doesn’t seek to promote a pre-determined ideology, narrates the war from his own point of view, and has a particular perspective on the war and its margins. Thus, comparing different versions of a single phenomenon can help avoid one-sided interpretations by providing a more wholesome view of the issue. In the following article, in addition to providing a brief history on the relations between France and Algeria, we attempt to study the narratives of the French war of independence while adopting a comparative approach to present an introduction of the social and political contexts in which they were narrated.

Keywords: Algeria, colonization, France, independence, literature, memory, resistance, war.

1. falavi@ut.ac.ir
2. Corresponding Author: z.rezvantalab@ut.ac.ir
US Political and Security Strategy toward China during 2008_2012, based on Soft Balancing

Seyed Mohammad Tabatabayi
Assistant Professor, International Relations, Allameh Tabatabaei University, Iran

Amir Ghiyasi
M.A. in International Relations, Allameh Tabatabaei University, Iran

Received: 7 June 2013 - Accepted: 16 Oct 2013

Abstract
Beginning of the 21st century for the United States coincided with the economic and military advancements of East Asia, the largest populated country. Becoming a US rival, East Asia poses an international threat to the US. The influence of china on economy across various international regions, its permanent seat in UNSC with the right to veto, and the huge debt the US owes to China have all made it difficult for the US to confront China directly. The aim of this paper is to illustrate through the use of soft-balancing theories, US political and security policies during the years 2008-2012 toward an economic, military, and political uprising. Through the cooperation and establishment of broad military ties with China’s neighbors, the US has had challenging regions put China under pressure. It has had international organizations and regional institutions increase the economic and political costs of China, while it continues its competition with China to weaken its influence and militarily dominance in the region.

Keywords: Asia Pacific, China, international system, soft balance, strategy, United States.

1. tabasm234@yahoo.fr
2. Corresponding Author: ghiyasi.a@gmail.com
Scotland’s Fate in the Union with Great Britain: Scottish National Identity and the Process of Devolution

Hessamoddin Vaez-zadeh 1
Assistant Professor, British Studies, University of Tehran, Iran

Yaghma Kaabi 2
PhD Candidate, European Studies, University of Tehran, Iran

Received: 28 June 2013 - Accepted: 17 Oct. 2013

Abstract
Devolution of powers has been a matter of increasing importance in European countries, especially after the Second World War. With the aim to reinforce political participation and continue the convergence of the regions, central governments have devolved some of their powers and responsibilities to regional and local administrations. In Britain, devolution of powers to the three regions of Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland was carried out with the coming to power of New Labour in 1997. The aim of the British government was to create greater trust and unity between these regions and the central government, in the greater framework of the United Kingdom. The aim of this paper is to analyze the processes of devolution in Scotland and to discuss matters pertaining to nationalism and national identity. This paper seeks to answer questions regarding the scope and the influence of devolution, and to present the reasons why Scotland has moved away from the central government. The significance of this research lies in the fact that after 300 years of union, the Scots participated in a 2014 referendum to determine whether they would or would not continue to remain in the Union (formed in 1707). Either way, the outcome of the referendum would be highly influential both in Scotland’s internal affairs and in its relations with Westminster and the European Union.

Keywords: decentralisation, independence, national identity, nationalism, regionalism, Union.

1. Corresponding Author: hvaez@ut.ac.ir
2. y.kaabi@ut.ac.ir
France’s Transatlantic Politics under Nicholas Sarkozy

Said Khaloozadeh 1
PhD. in Political Sciences, University of Paris, French

Received: 12 May 2013 - Accepted: 29 Aug. 2013

Abstract
With the rise of Nicholas Sarkozy to power, in an evident spin, France’s foreign policy became American in essence. From the very first year of his presidency Sarkozy adopted a parallel policy to the U.S. Atlanticism is considered an important and inevitable leverage in Sarkozy’s foreign policy and his government marked a high point in foreign policy after de Gouille. This new approach is completely evident in the French transatlantic policies and we can clearly see the changes of France’s policies which are inspired by closeness to the U.S regarding Islamic republic of Iran. Sarkozy’s new approach in foreign policy includes a balanced standpoint of Eurocentrism and Atlantiscm in which the European Union and NATO are considered strategic and operational complementaries. Sarkozy tried to explain the closeness to the U.S in a framework of European policies. Sarkozy is looking for a new definition of the role of France in the international relations. He is trying to achieve more influence and credit in the international scene by leveraging Atlantiscm and closeness to the U.S. Parallel with strengthening transatlantic interactions, Sarkozy has tried to announce the return of his country to the NATO military branch, Achieving the most share of NATO’s command and also dispatching forces to Afghanistan. In this paper, the intensification of the French foreign policy towards Iran in line with France’s policy in getting closer to the U.S is also discussed.

Keywords: French foreign policy, French security and defense policy, NATO Treaty, Nicholas Sarkozy, transatlantic policies, transatlantic relations, United States.

1. saidkhaloozadeh@yahoo.fr
A Critique and Evaluation on Latin American Theories of Development after the Cold War

Mohammad Javad Ranjkesh 1
Assistant Professor, International Relations, Ferdowsi University of Mashhad, Iran

Hamid Reza Keshavarz 2
M.A. in International Relations, Ferdowsi University of Mashhad, Iran

Hossein Asghari Sani 3
M.A. in of International Relations, Ferdowsi University of Mashhad, Iran

Received: 24 Nov. 2012 - Accepted: 11 March 2013

Abstract
With the expression of the modernization theory as the dominant paradigm of development during the 1950s, approaches towards development were extracted from this paradigm. But with the birth of the attachment school of thought, the modernization theory was scrutinized. For Latin American countries however, the attachment school of thought was considered a Marxist ideology up until the end of the Cold War. Towards the end of the Cold War, and with the changes that took place in the international system, Marxist visions, including the attachment school of thought were also scrutinized due to a lack of resources. Latin American countries were able to distance themselves from the attachment system, and instead establish proper relations with advanced countries that helped their development. The aim of this study is examine and criticize common visions regarding the development of Latin American countries after the Cold War era. According to the findings in this paper, Latin American countries are advancing towards growth and development through their approaches to structural and institutional globalization of economics.

Keywords: attachment, Cold War, development, globalization of economics, Latin America, modernization, post Washington Consensus.

1. Corresponding Author: ranjkesh@hotmail.com
2. hkesha365@yahoo.com
3. h.asgharisani@gmail.com
A View on Cultural Diplomacy in France; The High Position of Culture in Diplomacy

Nahid Shahverdiani 1
Assistant Professor, French Language and Literature, University of Tehran, Iran

Samira Saeidian 2
MA in British Studies, University of Tehran, Iran

Received: 17 May 2013 - Accepted: 25 Aug 2013

Abstract
There is no doubt that culture is of the most important principles of diplomacy in a country that established the first ministry of culture in the world. Such a unique attention to culture and its role in international relations is based on the French government and the politicians’ view and concentration on the issue of culture in this country for a long time. Since five centuries ago, culture has been considered by the government (or the authority) in this country and has been among the basic elements of identity and power. On the other hand, France has tried to found its historical magnificence and power on the basis of culture and art all through the history especially since the Louis XIV era. The government’s support from culture in all aspects and presenting issues such as “cultural exception” recently, have been done in this regard. The question which can be asked is: With what system and support has France made such a complicated network and what purposes is France following in this way? The current paper tries to depict the role and position of culture in the internal and foreign policy of France through a historical approach and present a clear image from the cultural diplomacy of this country.

Keywords: cultural magnificence, diplomacy, France, government.

1. nshahver@ut.ac.ir
2. Corresponding Author: saedian@alumni.ut.ac.ir
Islamic Uprising and the Pattern of Turkish Government

Nesa Zahedi
Assistant Professor, Political Sciences, Mofid University, Iran

Received: 29 June 2013 - Accepted: 6 Nov. 2013

Abstract
A wave of revolutions to end corruption across Arab nations began to unfold towards the end of 2011, and continue to threaten North African and Mediterranean countries. Now however, the question remains, which political example does these newly founded Islamic uprisings want to follow? The aim of this paper is to analyze this question, with a specific focus on Turkey. Can Turkey’s liberal, political, and economic policies be a suitable model for countries experiencing the Arab Spring, to follow in order to establish an Islamic Liberalism? Turkey has had a long history of Secularism. And since it was never colonized, it lacks the Post-Colonial Syndrome that other Arab nations have experienced. While it is true that Arab countries have not experienced a homogeneous social movement, and so Turkey’s example cannot be an ideal model for the Arab World, we set out to analyze the process Turkey underwent to get to its current situation, and to see if certain features of Turkey’s policies can or cannot be applied to other Arab countries, both politically and economically.

Keywords: Islamic Awakening, New Ottoman, strategic depth doctrine, Turkey’s foreign policy.